If you draw the line in the painting you do not want, undo your line immediately and disappears you. If you draw a line in the painting you do not want, leave the line immediately and disappear. One thing is certain: if you do not act immediately, we will be mortgage our future. One thing is safe: if we do not, let's be mortgaged the future of our children. I picked it up immediately, this kind of thing comes naturally to him and he told him immediately, it's a lot of ease for this kind of thing going to be good if it could now start immediately from production lines Which do not belong in the EU. It would be good to suspend the cultivation of products that are not useful from the EU. One thing is certain: if you do not act immediately, we will be credited to our futures, do not act to engage ours. One thing is safe: if we do not, let's be mortgaged the future of our children. I should immediately like to express my sympathy and worry for our Italian colleagues at this stage. I want to express without all my sympathy and consternation our Italian colleagues. The safety forces to intervene immediately to stop an escalation of violence. Safety forces have to intervene immediately to avoid an escalation of violence. I do not think it's immediately, but those who mean the same, do not they? I heard "immediately" in love, but you are right that is less common in love than "right away" in the corpus of the American contemporary English (360 million words), was 5803 instances for "right away" 123 for "immediately," but I believe in some parts of the United States the proportion may vary. At the British National Corpus 1980-1993 (1 million words), 355 for "right away" and 8 for "straight away" both Corpora can be accessed through In addition, I do not check the individual entries to see if there were any other meanings included than the "immediately" - for example, In love, * a * "immediately" (noun) can be a section of the race track without any curves as much as I know, this is correct. "I'll take care of it immediately" in the midst of it, I'll take care of it right away. I believe "immediately" in Be means the same thing, but it would be better to hear from a speaker be on that. This bre-speaker says James is certain intriguing corpora, KHS. I was surprised by the enormous Between imbalance "immediately" and "immediately" at the British National Corpus. I had a look through the first page of visits to "immediately", and although there are some with different immediately meanings, they are not enough to distort global results. I noticed that half of the "immediately" hits came from fiction, but I can not think of any inference to be taken from it. We just have to conclude that "right away" is much more common in BE also found this [now?] - very short - previous segment about "right / immediately". This bre-speaker says James is right I noticed that half of the "immediately" hits came from fiction, but I can not think of any inference to be taken from it. We just have to conclude that "right away" is [now?] Much more common in BE also fiction has more dialogue, which can indicate a relationship of some kind with informality, but it is only 50% So ... I found these phrases on the internet. So, it seems that the first two are and and the next two be, right? Can I fit "once" in all these? I needed her to get the absent right. "I can not change everything right away. "If someone comes, let me know immediately." "Tomorrow, at once. "I needed her to start at the same time." "I can not change everything at once" means I can not change everything at the same time. "If someone comes, let me know at once." "Tomorrow, at the same time." There is a contradiction between "tomorrow" and "at the same time", which means "now" in this context. I think you mean "Go there tomorrow, the first thing." I think I'd be more inclined to say "I'll do it immediately" than "I'll do it right away," but I'm not sure I'd lean to "right" with every time of the verb. "I can not change everything at once" means I can not change everything at the same time. Yes, there is allfase to change several things at the same time. With "far right" the Ænfase is about the time that the change is started. Interesting. I found these phrases on the internet. So, it seems that the first two are and and the next two be, right? Not completely. Immediately it is used in American English, only much less commonly. Here are the most recent coca numbers, the AE database. Immediately - 9134 Immediately - 225 I also think that immediately can have a slightly different nuance, sometimes (which I can not prove). But for me, it immediately means "now." Immediately can mean "before doing anything else". It seems a little more relaxed than immediately. An example of the database: So, once you did the meat balls, put them in the sauce immediately I think the allfase here is "First before going to the next step." I do not think that isnfase is "Almãndegas will be destroyed if you do not take them to the sauce right away." "Immediately" also fits in this context, right? The sentence was said by a Canadian, will be a BE speaker also pick up "immediately" as the first choice? "I bought a used car. I hope it does not break immediately." I do not think an American would put "immediately" in this sentence, and make all three adjustment phrase? "When I saw him, I immediately recognized him." "When I saw him, I immediately recognized him." They all fit, but it is unlikely that you listen to third in the US many times. Update on my search Corpus: now, in the corpus of the American contemporary contemporary (Coke) shows 625 cases of "direct" and 9,123 cases of "immediately". This supports what Kentix said, which is much less common to use the "immediately" expression in American English. Last edition: May 30, 2019 and in the sentence I put anterior, this is, I bought a used car. I hope you do not break immediately ":" At the same time "does not work, right? If no, you can discover some simple rule when they are interchangeable à € à € and when not "At the same time" at the same time "seems a bit strange in this sentence. For me," at the same time "has more the idea of" without any delay, "while" immediately "there is more the idea of" in the future next ", so if you are expressing the idea of" without any delay ", you should be able to use both, but if you mean only some time in the future (reason "From a once time." In addition, the site for Coca and many of the other corpora related to English that used to be on the BYU site are now (Mark is retiring ) Housed on this site: Oh, and on this site the Strathy Corpus (Canadian English) Dá: Direct = 12 instances immediately = 461 I heard there (or go be) a more updated corpus of English S British than the BNC, but I actually did not find one anywhere (and there seems to be one on the English-corpora website). Single edition: May 30, 2019 "at once" would mean he broke while you tried to drive it. "At once" it would mean he broke while you tried to drive it. And "a once time" does not work in the past while "immediately" does, right? I bought a car and broke immediately. "I bought a car and broke a once time. "I bought a car and broke at once" sounds a bit strange for me, not because of the time of the verb, but because "at the same time" seems to suggest "in response to a suggestion." Is here? "At the same time" also do not fit, right? "I needed someone to help me immediately, but everyone refused." "I needed someone to help me immediately, but everyone refused." And "a once time" does not work in the past while "immediately" does, right? I bought a car and broke immediately. "I bought a car and broke a once time. And if you say, "And it broke almost at the same time" - that sounds good to me. I searched for Coca (corpus of contemporary American English) for the specific "broke immediately" and "broke immediately." Two hits for "at the same time" and just one for "immediately". When I just saw the uses of both by evidences of past verbs, both had a good performance (like my use of "goodly"?) Share. And are these two interchangeable ones? "When I saw him, I recognized him immediately. "When I saw him, I recognized it immediately. Thanks. And how about this example. Do the three of them fit? "When your alarm clock goes out in the morning, do you get up immediately / immediately?" (Respond to # 26) I think they probably all work, but I like "a once time" less than I like the other two. So usually I think is the safest to use "immediately". It looks like it fits into any context mentioned here. Then "immediately" and we need to be very careful with "a once time". I think the main difference between immediately immediately and once can be levels of formality (immediately -> immediately -> at the same time). One or the other may not seem so good, depending on the level of formality of the situation and its other language in the sentence. And 'immediately' used mainly in English spoken? I think "immediately" to be more informal, and possibly as a result, used more Informal English than it is in English writing. However, there are many slightly more formal situations in spoken that they may deserve the use of "immediately". I checked the coca for only how many of each one there was, then just from a perspective of nominos (you would have to comb through the instances or know more about the use of corpora than I) to determine how many were used à € à €
