Last year, Chase made some sweeping changes to two of its most popular travel rewards credit cards. The Chase Sapphire Reserve® and Chase Sapphire Preferred® Card received improved bonus categories and benefits, including new travel perks for cardholders. One of these updates was the announcement of several upcoming Chase Sapphire Lounge by The Club airport locations — including New York-LaGuardia (LGA), Boston (BOS), and Hong Kong (HKG). However, Chase didn't reveal many other details at the time, other than Chase Sapphire Reserve® and Priority Pass members would get complimentary access and that lounges would be opened in collaboration with Airport Dimensions, a global lounge operator. Read more: The Chase Sapphire Preferred and Sapphire Reserve are adding lucrative new bonus categories and benefits — with no change in annual fees. Now we have more information on where (and when) these lounges will be opening, with a total of six locations on deck so far. Here's what to know if you're eagerly awaiting the arrival of the Chase Sapphire Lounges. We're focused here on the rewards and perks that come with each card. These cards won't be worth it if you're paying interest or late fees. When using a credit card, it's important to pay your balance in full each month, make payments on time, and only spend what you can afford to pay. Chase Sapphire airport lounges coming soon 18.49% - 25.49% Variable Good to Excellent 18.49% - 25.49% Variable Good to Excellent More Information Earn 60,000 bonus points after you spend $4,000 on purchases in the first 3 months from account opening. Capital One recently launched its own, with the first Capital One Lounge now open at Dallas-Fort Worth (DFW) and more to follow at Denver (DEN) and Washington Dulles (IAD) airports. With Chase entering the airport lounge space, cardholders will have more choices than ever if they're looking for a stylish, comfortable spot to relax before a flight. There are now six Chase Sapphire Lounges planned for 2022 and 2023, at the following locations: New York-LaGuardia — Terminal B Boston — Terminal B San Diego (SAN) — Terminal 1 Phoenix (PHX) — Terminal 4 South Las Vegas (LAS) — Terminal 1 C Gates Read more: The best credit cards with free airport lounge access of 2022 Las Vegas is the newest lounge to join the group, as first reported by Thrifty Traveler. The Phoenix lounge addition is also quite recent, and it will open in the airport's brand-new concourse with a planned opening in the summer of 2022. Chase Sapphire Lounges promise a premium experience, with amenities that include "access to exceptional, authentic and regionally inspired food, drink, art, entertainment, and wellness." Chase's lounges will face stiff competition at some of these airports, because New York, Phoenix, Las Vegas, and Hong Kong also have Centurion Lounges, which are regarded by many as among the most upscale in the world. Who can access Chase Sapphire Lounges? As of now, Chase has said Chase Sapphire Reserve® cardholders and Priority Pass members will be able to access Chase Sapphire Lounges at no cost. It's not yet known if other Chase credit cards, like the Chase Sapphire Preferred® Card, will allow access on a limited or discounted basis. Read more: The best airport lounges you can access with the Amex Platinum Considering there are nearly a dozen popular travel rewards credit cards that offer Priority Pass membership, it's likely the new Chase Sapphire Lounges will be quite crowded with a less-exclusive feel than similar Centurion and Capital One lounge locations. You can get unlimited complimentary Priority Pass® lounge visits with cards like The Platinum Card® from American Express (which also grants access to Centurion Lounges) or the Capital One Venture X Rewards Credit Card (which comes with Capital One airport lounge access). Because of this, there's really not a huge incentive to open the Chase Sapphire Reserve® if Sapphire Lounge access is your main concern. However, the Reserve a great card for other reasons, including a bonus of 60,000 bonus points after you spend $4,000 on purchases in the first 3 months from account opening, up to $300 in travel credits each year, top-notch travel insurance, and high earning rates in popular categories. Read more: Amex Platinum vs Chase Sapphire Reserve: How to decide which premium card is best for you Keep in mind the Chase Sapphire Reserve® comes with a $550 annual fee, so it's not for everyone. If you're looking for a card that offers Priority Pass membership (and eventual access to Sapphire Lounges) at a lower price point, be sure to look at the Capital One Venture X Rewards Credit Card with an annual fee of $395. Here's our Capital One Venture X review for all the details. When someone passes away, many things must be resolved, including finances. If your loved one had credit cards, those credit cards will need to be canceled once they pass away. This is not something that automatically happens once someone dies, but it is an important task to complete. Even after you've taken the steps to freeze your loved one's credit report, you should contact individual credit issuers to cancel their credit cards. This process is generally easy and straightforward. Try to get organized beforehand with names of accounts and passwords. You can request a credit report for a comprehensive view of which accounts need to be settled. It may also be helpful to monitor the mail for incoming statements and check for old invoices or statements. Once you've gathered information about the accounts that need to be canceled, here's a guide on what you can do next: Determine if others are named on the account Before you contact a credit issuer to cancel an account, it's important to determine if the account is a joint account or if it has authorized users. In the case of a joint account, the account is equally shared between the deceased and another person. It's a good idea to notify the co-owner of the account to let them know that they will be solely responsible for the account now. The co-owner can contact the card issuer to find out what that means for them. This is true for bank accounts, as well. In the case of authorized users, there are no shared responsibilities on the credit account. The deceased, as primary account holder, is responsible for all payments. This means you can move forward with canceling the card completely. However, it's helpful to notify users that you'll be canceling the account, as they will no longer be able to use their card after you do so. Notify the issuer Once you know whether the deceased shared the account with anyone, it's time to notify the issuer. In the case of a joint account, you, or the joint account holder, will simply need to remove the deceased's name from the account. For all other cases, you will need to cancel the account. It's important to do this as quickly as possible to avoid any possible fees or accrued interest on the accounts. Call each card issuer and ask to speak with "Deceased Account Services" or the "Estate Unit." Many card issuers have dedicated lines for this that you can find on their websites. When you notify the issuer, be prepared to present an original copy of the death certificate and any important court documents pertaining to the estate. Not all issuers request this information, but many do, so it's helpful to have access if necessary. If the deceased had a balance on their credit card, it will need to be resolved through their estate by the executor of the estate. This will be a part of the probate process. At no point should you pay a creditor using your personal funds. Instead, the creditor should petition the estate for the remaining balance on the account. If there aren't enough assets in the estate to cover the debt, creditors may be out of luck. This is because credit card debt is unsecured debt. Family members aren't responsible for a loved one's credit card debt, except in the case of a joint account. Authorized users are also generally not responsible for paying balances. Debt collectors and creditors can contact relatives about paying debt but can't use deceptive or abusive tactics to enforce payment due to the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. This act applies whether you are responsible for the debt or not. Aside from protecting you from potential harassment, it also gives you the ability to defer communication to a lawyer if you choose to employ one. Check for rewards redemptions If the deceased has any rewards left on their credit accounts, you may be able to redeem them as an authorized representative of the estate. In order to redeem rewards, the authorized person will have to put in a request with the issuer and make sure that the account balance is paid in full. Many issuers have a timeframe for paying off the balance, so make sure you check this detail. Rewards will be issued in the name of the deceased and sent to the address they have on file. Cancel recurring payments If the deceased used their credit card to make recurring payments on any other accounts, such as utility bills or other subscriptions, you will need to cancel those. Canceling the credit card is not enough to stop these payments from being processed. Check any statements your loved one left behind for recurring bills, including cell phone service, internet service and cable. Any services that have automatic payment with a credit card will need to be canceled with the service provider. Dispose of the card Once the card account has been canceled, it's important to destroy the physical card. Also, try to gather and destroy any cards from authorized users. The best way to dispose of any cards is to run them through a shredder or cut them into pieces so that the magnetic stripe and EMV chip aren't viable and the personal information isn't readable. Also, check to see if anyone has access to any credit account numbers and inform them that the accounts are no longer valid. Lastly, destroy any remaining card statements that are more than 60 days old. However, if any of the credit accounts were used to make tax-deductible purchases, hold on to those statements from the past six years. You will probably need them to help complete any final tax returns. Using a deceased person's credit card could make you liable for new and old debt on the card. Once a person has passed away, their accounts should be closed and their cards destroyed. Dangers of using a deceased person's credit card Once a person has passed away, their accounts are no longer valid. Unless you are the co-owner of a joint account, you shouldn't use a deceased person's credit card. This is true even for expenses pertaining to the deceased. Using a deceased person's credit card is fraud, even if you were an authorized user, and keeping the accounts open could open the door for identity theft or fraud. Joint credit card accounts When the co-owner of a joint account dies, the account can be taken over by the remaining owner. The co-owner's name will need to be removed from the account so that sole responsibility for the account will fall on the remaining owner. Joint accounts are different from authorized user accounts. Both parties are responsible for the debt on a joint account, while an authorized user is not a primary cardholder and holds no responsibility for any debt accumulated on the account. If you and a relative have a joint account and your relative passes away, you can take over the account. However, if you are an authorized user on your relative's account and their account is canceled after death, you lose access to the account.
